

"An analysis of the normal mind will arrive at the primary grammatical fact which cannot be explained or reduced any further: this is the basic polarity of the subject and the object. The dichotomy of the "I" and the "World" is implicit in all experience, in all verbal expression. This means that the meaning of "I" stands on one side, while on the other stands a whole vocabulary and grammar which refer to the "World".

The polarity of the subject and the object makes the basic structure of consciousness, but does not apply to the nonconscious experience.

It belongs to human destiny that man wants to reestablish this primary one-ness which existed before the splitting into subject and object occurred.
